COMMENTARY

Market Review

The US stock market recorded another quarter of solid gains in the third quarter, with the S&P 500 Index returning 7.7% for the period. As has been the case for the entire year, growth stocks outpaced value shares, with the Russell 1000 Growth Index returning 9.2% compared to a 5.7% return for the Russell 1000 Value Index. Stocks were helped by robust second-quarter earnings reports on the back of strong economic data with a healthy employment environment and high consumer confidence.

From a sector perspective, the highest returns in the growth index came from the information technology (+14%) and health care (+13%) sectors. Energy (-5%) was the only sector with a significant negative return in the quarter.

Portfolio Review

In the third quarter, the portfolio's benchmark, the Russell 1000 Growth Index, had its highest total return since the 4th quarter of 2013 and the portfolio performed nearly in line with it. Stock selections in the industrials and information technologies sectors lagged the benchmark, but this was counterbalanced by outperformance in the new communication services sector, where both allocation and selection were strong, along with strong stock selection in the materials sector. Our largest positive contributor to performance in the quarter was Facebook, a stock not held in the portfolio, which declined after reporting slowing North American user growth and rising expenses as the company is spending to improve security and privacy for users of its platform. Management had indicated that increased spending in these areas would weigh on margins going forward.

Positive contributors to performance from positions held in the portfolio included O'Reilly Automotive, which delivered strong earnings and same store sales growth. The company continues to be the top retailer in the aftermarket auto parts industry. Thermo Fisher Scientific rose after reporting financial results that included 8% organic revenue growth driven by strength in biopharma and China. The markets that the company operates in remain strong, and life science spending globally should continue to increase. Ross Stores also performed well, delivering strong same store sales growth as the off-price retailing industry continues to gain market share at the expense of traditional department store retailers.

Amazon.com was the largest individual detractor on a relative basis. As mentioned in the past, the strategy does not own Amazon due to what we believe is excessive valuation. Other detractors included Electronic Arts, Booking Holdings, and Intercontinental Exchange. Electronic Arts declined as the company reported less than expected digital revenue growth, and delayed the release of Battlefield V by one month. While these issues negatively impact our near term earnings forecast, our long-term investment case remains unchanged. As one of the leading video game publishers, we expect Electronic Arts to benefit from solid secular growth in the video game industry while generating high returns on capital due to its strong competitive position and improved business model. Booking Holdings declined as the company guided to less than expected room night growth. Management continues to reinvest efficiently in the business, which we believe will generate strong returns on growth capital going forward.

Intercontinental Exchange was a detractor as market transaction activity slowed during the summer months and revenue growth in its data services business decelerated slightly. We continue to believe that the company is well-managed with high returns on capital and solid growth prospects.

Recently added and deleted positions

During the third quarter, we initiated one new, but so far very small position. The Portfolio participated in the Initial Public Offering of Elanco Animal Health, which was spun out of Eli Lilly & Co. Similar to Zoetis, which is also a portfolio holding, Elanco is benefitting from secular growth in protein consumption and spending on companion animals. We believe it has sustainable competitive advantages in the markets it serves, and its fiscal discipline will result in sharply higher returns on growth capital in the coming quarters and years.

Outlook

We remain concerned about what we believe to be the excessive valuations placed on stocks with the highest growth rates. We believe that many investors have gravitated toward higher risk securities such as high growth, high valuation stocks due to a supportive environment of strong economic growth and low market volatility. However, this environment may be starting to change as rising interest rates may ultimately result in slowing economic growth and rising market volatility. There are other risks looming as well, such as uncertainty around trade negotiations and growing crises in several emerging markets. In general though, we believe that the equity market could continue to perform well driven by strong earnings growth in what today is a very strong US economy. We expect that investors will continue to maintain exposure to equities but may rotate into higher quality, reasonably-priced stocks in order to be more conservatively-positioned given the potential for slowing growth next year and rising risks. We believe there is some evidence that this rotation has started as sectors such as health care and industrials saw improved performance in the third quarter while high growth, high valuation stocks such as Twitter, and Tesla weakened.

In terms of positioning, the strategy's largest overweight continues to be in the Financials sector, where we have several holdings with wide moats, high returns on capital, solid growth prospects and attractive valuations. We also remain overweight versus the benchmark in both health care and information technology, where despite the strong recent performance of both sectors, we continue to find stocks that meet our quality and valuation criteria. Our biggest underweight is the new communications services sector, which includes a number of stocks that we believe are overvalued and vulnerable as interest rates rise and market volatility increases.

Overall, the Portfolio – consistent with its investment philosophy - remains defensively positioned in stocks with strong secular growth prospects that trade at a discount to what they are worth based upon our internal valuation analysis.
